The First Time

There is an old story about Mark Twain and a conversation which he was having. The man said to Twain: "You know, I wish I had never read Huckleberry Finn."

With a bit of surprise and a scowl, Twain ask why this man would make such a remark to him. "So that I could have the pleasure of reading it again for the first time," came the reply.

That applies to a lot in life. Familiarity often causes us to lose or to forget our initial excitement. It is true of literature, art, music, religion – even personal relationships. If you have lost your enthusiasm for something or someone important in your life, how can you begin again as if you were seeing it, or experiencing that person, for the first time?

Find a way to do that, and so much of life will take on a fresh new meaning.
